It is reported by the Bookseller that the new portrait of Hawthorne is the result of an artful stratagem on the part of John Lothrop Motley. Hawthorne, who could not endure to have his picture taken, was beguiled by Motley into the studio of a London photographer "to examine some portraits. The novelist dropped into a chair, and Motley, going to the other side of the room, called his attention to some object. He looked up, with that glance of quick intelligence which his friends remember so well, and at that moment the photographer, privy to the little conspiracy, exposed the plate." This portrait of Hawthorne is said to be the best in existence.
